1. Recognize Triggers
- Identify what sparks your anxiety or stress — it could be specific thoughts, people, situations or sounds.
- Note the way your body feels when you are around these triggers and have strategies to support yourself in a healthy way.
- Keep a journal or notes to track your feelings and patterns — this can help identify potential patterns.

2. Build an Emotional First Aid Kit
- Learn which mindfulness exercises help you stay present and centered.
- Have sensory items on hand, like soothing music, scented candles or essential oils.
- Make a list of people you trust to reach out to when you need support.

3. Develop a Coping Plan
- Create a coping plan with healthy strategies for managing anxiety. A plan can give you a sense of preparedness and control during these times.
- Identify activities you enjoy, such as reading, exercising, socializing or spending time in nature.
- Practice deep breathing, meditation and other grounding techniques — regular practice can improve your ability to respond calmly.

4. Develop a Personal Support Network
- Identify at least three people you trust and can confide in during distress.
- Reach out to trusted friends, loved ones or a support group when you need to talk.
- Schedule regular check-ins with loved ones to nurture emotional bonds.

5. Practice Self-Compassion
- Treat yourself as you would with friends — with patience, comfort and understanding.
- Embrace imperfections without judgment: cultivate self-compassion by acknowledging yourself without criticism, recognizing that everyone is human and experiences ups and downs.
- Every life is unique. Celebrate your journey with gratitude and kindness.
